Thousands Huddle Under

Awnings, Waiting for the

Heavy Downpour to Cease

The worst thunder and rain storm of the season struck the city just before the traffic rush hour yesterday evening. In black darkness, relieved only by store lights, the streets were whipped by a downpour of rain driven by a 50-mile gale out of the Northwest. Pedestrians scurrled for any shelter available, and thousands huddled under awnings and in doorways and subway klosks for more than an hour. Water

Damage to Private Property
In addition to the temporary crippling of public service industries, considerable damage was done to private property throughout the city). The wind ripped signs from store-fronts and sent them clattering to the streets, while roofs were partially torn up on a number of frame houses.

A bolt struck the flag pole in Mount Morris Park and shattered the upper staff. In front of 263 West Fifty-second Street a large tree, struck by lightning, crashed to the roof of a passing van and bounded to the street, where it lay crosswise. A fire truck company was called to remove it. Several minor accidents to pedestrians and cars were reported, because of automobiles skidding on the wet streets.

Electric fire alarms were set ringklosks for more than an hour. Water ran a foot deep in some crosstown

About three-quarters of an inch of rain fell in the first downpour and by the time the final drizzling shower had ceased the weather experts had registered 77-100ths of an inch and many thousands of dollars' worth of damage waited for repair men.

The Bronx suffered more severely than the rest of the city, and was still feeling the after-effects last night. The subway was flooded, and at 5:18 p. m. all traffic on the Bronx lines was stopped. Service was not resumed until 6:45 o'clock.

Crowds Wade Through Streams Two trains were in the West Farms subway tunnel under the Harlem River at 145th Street, when the overflow from gutters and sewers of The Bronx streamed into the tube and took the power from the third rail. Several hundred passenger left the stalled trains and splashed through the tunnel to the Mott Avenue station, several blocks away.

There conditions were not much better. This station, already the largest in the entire subway system, is being extended at the northern end and shaft openings made by the workmen let rivers of water in. Most of the delayed passengers finally left the station and used the Union Railway system by way of the 149th Street crosstown line.

Interborough company, at least 35,000 northbound passengers swarmed out of the stations in the flooded section and received "block tickets," which they used after tramping a mile through the rain to the 149th Street station of the Third Avenue "L." Floods were also reported at stations near the end of the line, but they caused little excitement, because of the few passengers. At the Longwood Avenue station of the Lexington Avenue subway traffic would not be normal until morning, Superintendent Merritt reported.

Telephone service was nearly paralyzed in the Intervale, Tremont, Fordham and Melrose exchanges. For nearly half an hour it was impossible to call by telephone, and emergency wires had to be operated.

Although the service in the city proper was not disrupted, there was considerable delay. Thousands of persons trapped in stores put in calls for taxicabs or umbrellas, and many hundreds called up their homes to say they would be late.

Bronx Suffers Most, as Subway Is Flooded and All Trains Stopped, While 'Phones Refuse to Work

Floods Run in Streets

Trains Stopped, While trubber-coated traffic police labored mightily to break the tie-up. Surface car traffic on Broadway was practically stalled for an hour. Crosstown lines were so delayed that the ferryboats suffered from unusual congestion when the downpour permitted the cars to begin making connections at the river front. The streets were choked from the custom house far uptown, and the Brooklyn Bridge traffic was also affected.

Electric life alarms were set ringing in Brooklyn because of lightning interfering with the system. The Fire Department reported eighteen false slarms in different parts of the borough. All the calls came in at once and the fire houses were emptied by vain responses.

and at the most disastrous stage of his career his adherents might have outnumbered those whose main object was to take him out of power.

Devery rarely lost a friend, and he never worried about keeping an enemy. Capable of a stormy rage at times, his proverbial good nature always asserted itself and left him laughing at attacks.

Insults glanced from his consciousness, and he would have felt that something was lacking if the attacks of reformers had ceased. One of his most treasured possession was a series of thirty-six scrap books, devoted to caricatures and bitter lampoons of himself. They were indexed and catalogued, so that he could turn to the things he wanted to show visitors.

Laughed Over Insults

"When I get old I'll have all the friends I need in these here scrapbooks," he used to say. "I don't believe any other man was ever soaked as hard as I've been, but I can sit in my library now and get more hearty laughs out of those things than out of any show I ever saw.

"My family isn't hurt by it, because they know me for what I am. "My family isn't hurt by it, because they know me for what I am. And they don't hurt me; they just add to the fun I get out of living. Why there are things in those books by people that never saw me, let alone knew me, that would make your hair stand up."

Attacks on Devery were almost as common in the West and South as in his New York stamping ground, and probably no cartoonist in the country failed to take at least one whack at "Big Bill."

Halled to take at least one which at "Big Bill."

He had a knack of phrase making and an aptitude for nicknames that rarely has been equalled by the most successful politicians. He used this gift on friend and opponent until his terse characterizations of others were at least as famous as their more lengthy attacks on him. His favorite phrases were couched in the argot of the majority, and for years he invented more slang than the sporting writers. Joined the Force at 24 more slang than the sporting writers.

Joined the Force at 24

There was no position in the Police Department which Big Bill did not know as well as the top of his desk after he moved to Headquarters. He was a husky youth of twenty-four when he joined the police force, and he gave it the most active years of his life. For three years he was a patrolman, and virtually nothing was heard from him.

At the end of that time he becate a roundsman and began his fambus career of thief catching as well as his equally well known penchant for getting into trouble. In one capacity or another he represented the law in nearly all the troublesome precincts of the city, and he earned special commendation from his superiors on almost innumerable occasions.

He had an undoubted genius for saring lawbreakers when he wanted to, and became the most valuable assistant to Chief Inspector Byrnes, who was celebrated as a hunter of criminals. No one of his day knew more of the possibilities of police work, for the went on up to sergeant, then to captain, and linally became chief of the force.

A Prodigal Spender

Devery always said of himself that he had the touch of Midas. Unpromising things turned to gold almost without effort for him. Throughout his life he spent prodigally, but he slways Devery's characteristic verbiage kept the town laughing for a year or two. Once outside the breastworks politically, he stung his old running mates in Tammany Hall without hesitation and frequently.

"I fine you ten days' pay for not gettin' tipped off," said he while he was Police Commissioner to a patrolman up before him on trial. "I want you to distinctly remember," he continued, "that the first duty of a cop is to get tipped off. It was also considered significant that Grover A. Whalen, a stanch supporter of Enright, had been appointed Commissioner of Plants and Structures and removed from all concern in police affairs. While serving as the Mayor's secretary, Mr. Whalen was most active in police matters.

Making a special investigation of gambling conditions in the 4th Inspection District, by order of Mayor Hylan.

The announcement by the Mayor hymself that Mr. Hirshfield was making a survey in "the new Tenderloin," in the West Side Forties and Fifties, caused members of the Police Department who are accustomed to draw auguries from everyday events to whisper among themselves that Hylan was "after Enright's scalp."

In police matters.

Commissioner Hirshfield last night said:

"I am surprised that the Mayor has made a statement on this subject. I think we can get better results by working with as little publicity as possible."

District Attorney Swann said he had not been consulted encerning the investigation, but that he was always eager to prosecute such cases.

"The Mayor only to-day sent me information about a gambling house, and I was very glad to get it," said Mr. Swann. "That is the only thing on gambling I have received from the Mayor or the Police Commissioner this week."

nardly allow to pass without question. I think, for instance, that it is a little difficult to accept the judgment of Dr. Lewis when he writes: "He was a past in making them do what he wanted them to do. But by conscious effort as a young man he had so schooled himself that he never balanced what he regarded as right to say or do against its possible effect on his own fortune."

There is not such perfection in the world. Again we would like to look back over a period of years before agreeing unreservedly with Dr. Lewis in his estimate, "Roosevelt was not merely a good executive; he was one of the ablest executives we have ever had in public life; certainly, in this respect no other President can compare with him except Washington."

Taft Defines Roosevelt

Taft Defines Roosevelt

The book is not devoid, however, of interpretation. At least one valuable bit of analysis is contributed by William H. Taft in his introduction. "Theodore Roosevelt," he writes, "was not a radical man. He believed in law and order. He believed in the right of property. He had sound economic views, but injustice aroused him and led him into denunciation that often was mistaken for a radicalism that he really did not entertain. His radicalism, such as he had, took the form of undervaluing the necessity for orderly undervaluing the necessity for orderly procedure and of seeking a short cut to the reform of evil. He did not fully realize the ultimate results of such short cuts."

THE LIFE OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT.
By William Draper Lewis. With an introduction by William H. Tart. Published by the John C. Winston Company, pp. 480. Price, §3.15.

No biography of Theodore Roosevett could possibly be dull. William Draper Lewis, former dean of the Law School of the University of Pennsylvania, has written a book which is readable with-Roosevelt in College

There are interesting chapters Roosevelt's college course and early experiences in politics. From beginning of the Spanish War the of this man is filled with the mos early experiences in politics. From the beginning of the Spanish War the lift of this man is filled with the most extraordinarily dramatic happenings. The mere recital of them is sufficient thrilling and in some cases they have been well handled by Dr. Lewis, notable in the account of how the news of Minley's death came to Roosevelt it the wilds of the Adirondacks. In addition to the public life of Rooseve ample attention is paid to his privation to the public life of Rooseve ample attention is paid to his privatinterests and there is readable materion his activities as a naturalist, an eplorer, a boxer, a wrestler, a writer an reader. The only field of endeave in which Roosevelt seems to have be interested without being efficient will have the seems to have be interested without being efficient will have tennis. The account of the Panama Canal dispute is overpartiss and the story of the founding of the Progressive party somewhat inad quate. It is in connection with that Dr. Lewis makes a statemen which seems to us based on an entimisconception of Roosevelt. In spealing of Roosevelt's failure to dictar Taft's running mate, Lewis writer "It was due to what we may regard a perhaps his only serious weakness a political leader—his tendency underrate his own strength."

Dr. Lewis makes one shrewd statement concerning Roosevelt, but he confines it to his estimate of Roosevelt an historian. We think it might have been made much broader in its scop. "Certainly he was not always judicial writes Lewis, "and yet the very fat that bias was so obvious made the defect, comparatively speaking, harmless the sort of historical partisanshi which is really dangerous is that whice maquerades under the guise of impartiality; but one could see at a glanc where Roosevelt's sympathies lay an could make one's reservations accordingly."

The book suggests although it is the could make one's reservations accordingly."

The book suggests, although it be no means covers, the marvellous manner in which Roosevelt influence American ideals. There is enoug Roosevelt in the book to make the lisseem something more than the usu obituary which passes for biography.
